

Abstract

China's part in worldwide associations is of extraordinary concern by numerous researchers. China's industrialization and its modernization are one of the real advancements of the late twentieth century. China is en route of turning into a global power which makes her permanently, a vital partner in the international political coliseum. Once reluctant to participate in any international organization, China soon recognized how imperative its membership in such institutions e.g. the United Nations. In 1971, China became the permanent member of the United Nations and adopted open up policy towards world. Since then, China comprehensively involved in various fields of operations, e.g. peacekeeping, conflict resolution and humanitarian assistance.

The research fundamentally investigates how immaculate China's part in the United Nations in the Post-Cold war era. The research likewise tries to investigate that what effect does it makes and how imperative China's participation in the United Nations, for the West and the Third World States. This study is primarily trying to inter-relate China's legacy and its current participation in the United Nations.

This research is divided into seven chapters. The first chapter is of introduction and would discuss the significance and objectives of the study. Second chapter would discuss the concept of security and sovereignty and its relation with Chinese foreign policy. This chapter is supported by literature review to review the previous work and also support the argument. Third chapter would discuss a brief introduction of the history of the China, transitional phase of Chinese policies and Chinese participation in the United Nations. Chapter four would discuss the importance of international organizations.

Chapter five would discuss Chapter five would discuss the contribution of China in United Nations by evaluating various fields of operations. Chapter Six would discuss the other thematic issues such as terrorism and arms proliferation and the functional engagement of China in the United. Chapter seven is conclusion which presents a brief summary of the previous chapters. It will look ahead at what are some of the remaining challenges and outlines some of the suggestions and recommendations that could bring further success if implemented.