

Abstract

Present study attempts to examine water issues and its implications for South Asian security. South Asian region has been an attractive economic hub for the non-region people. It lies on the crossroads between South East Asia, the Middle East and Central Asia. This region is considered quite sensitive and strategically important region of the world.

Pakistan and India are the two important regional powers without whom South Asian region cannot progress; therefore the issues between these two countries should be resolved. Growing concerns on water distribution and supplies between these two nuclear powers may lead towards revamped conflicts in future.

It was analyzed that in order to overcome water issues and security concerns in South Asia, regional cooperation should be the first priority, India, Pakistan should overcome their long standing hostility and animosity; economic ties should be strengthened so that the countries could cooperate with each other on the basis of mutual interest.
